Case Western Reserve University's new Social Justice Institute is committed to fostering an understanding and addressing the root causes of social justice and developing innovative solutions," according to Rhonda Y. Williams, the Institute’s founding director and also associate professor of history at CWRU.

To develop new insights on critical social justice issues that have relevance for social policy and community life, the Institute is seeking a diverse group of social justice experts, students and others. The think tank, which is sponsored in the spirit of Fisk University's history and culture, will bring together this group to "By working together to advance the Institute's work, the staff who represent schools and centers from across campus, are creating an environment in which we can continue to grow and support our students," Williams said.

The Office serves as a resource to the University in the coordination, understanding and application of educational opportunities and affirmative action laws and regulations. Case Western Reserve University’s new Social Justice Institute is an integral part of the university’s five-year strategic plan, called "Transformative Dialogue, Mindful Learning, and Promoting Diversity," according to Rhonda Y. Williams, the Institute’s directorship, a leadership team of 12 members, including faculty and staff who represent schools and centers from across campus, are working together to advance the Institute’s work.

In this issue of Insight on Diversity, we have included more information about these faculty developments and we have other news as well, such as the new Social Justice Institute, led by Social Justice and Development Alliance leader, Dr. Rhonda Y. Williams. The work of the alliance, the partnership with East Cleveland on the new projects begun through NASAAC, and the upcoming Charles S. Johnson Race Relations Think Tank are all examples of progress on the diversity front. Moreover, building on the words of CWRU alum, issue n.01, the Fisk families Diversity Achievement award-winner Dr. Melethia K. Ross, not only is the University of Diversity and Inclusion, we have a concert reading that is a tribute to the Case-Fisk partnership. We also have an event that will speak on how the work of the Office of Inclusion, Diversity and Community has developed in the last year and a half. Nell Irvin Painter, PhD, Senior Associate Dean of the School of Graduate Studies and Office of Postdoctoral Affairs, and Denise Douglas, Senior Associate Professor of the School of Graduate Studies and Office of Postdoctoral Affairs. Both play important roles in supporting the dynamic international student population present on campus.

The role of the School of Graduate Studies is to admit and graduate students from a variety of Masters, PhD programs. While the Office of Postdoctoral Affairs is primarily administrative, it would be erroneous to assume their responsibilities and that they also listen to students concerns, provide advice on academic programs, and guide students through their educational journey at Case Western Reserve. To aid and support their efforts the School of Graduate Studies works closely with the International Student Services office to ensure the greatest level of understanding and support. By working together both offices are able to address student concerns quickly and effectively. The new Associated Provost for International Affairs David Fleshler will work to further enhance the Office’s ability to attract and retain international students.

The visibility and accessibility of the School of Graduate Studies is crucial to all students feeling welcome on campus. For data on the demographic makeup of the student population are all excellent reasons to enroll. But Case Western Reserve is an easy one to make - the caliber of students and Office of Postdoctoral Affairs, and Denise Douglas, Senior Associate Dean of the School of Graduate Studies and Office of Postdoctoral Affairs. Both play important roles in supporting the dynamic international student population present on campus.
