Seminar Title: Race, Food, and Justice Conference: Examining the Urban Food Movement

Purpose: The Provost Scholars will learn about the upcoming Race, Food and Justice Conference being held at Case Western Reserve University on April 19, 2018. The conference will examine the urban food movement through a social justice lens and feature both the Environmental Health Watch and the Rid-All Green Partnership. The Provost Scholars will also have an opportunity to work alongside Allyson Carpenter from Howard University, Washington, D.C., and lead a discussion about youth engagement, activism, and education focusing on social justice.

Presenter Biography:

Ms. Hunter Scott, is a young professional, with four years of experience in environmental health. Collaborating with national and local organizations on various projects, Ms. Scott operates as a community liaison promoting youth/community engagement, focusing on resource gathering, relationship building, critical thinking and public speaking. She has presented at national conferences on health disparities, social inequalities, and food access. She is also a State Licensed Lead Risk Assessor and a Healthy Homes Rating System Practitioner. Ms. Hunter will also discuss plans for the upcoming Social Justice Conference and the role the Provost Scholars could play as facilitators.

Objectives: At the end of the session, the Provost Scholars will:

- (1) Discuss critical elements that are associated with the planned Race, Food & Justice Conference.
- (2) Describe how they could become involved in social justice issues in Northeast Ohio.
