

Mark S. Fleisher, Ph.D. is a research professor the Begun Center for Violence Prevention Research and Education in Case Western Reserve's Mandel School of Applied Social Sciences. Fleisher is a cultural and linguistic anthropologist and a criminal ethnographer His research includes the culture and languages of indigenous people in the Canada; United States; Mexico, and Guatemala; and Sulawesi, Indonesia. He has studied ethnic group migration in Turkey; ethnic youth groups, Amsterdam, NL; homeless men and women as well as street criminals in Seattle, street gangs in Kansas City (MO) and Champaign (IL); and the culture and language of sexual violence in American prisons. His books include: Warehousing Violence (1989); Beggars and Thieves (1995; best book, Society for Applied Anthropology); Dead End Kids (1998, top 100 Books for Teenagers, New York Public Library); The Myth of Prison Rape (2009); Living Black: Social Life in an African American Neighborhood (2015; 2015, best book, 1015, Chicago Book Review). He also has published scholarly articles on social networks, culture research methodology, language analysis, street and prison gangs, and prison management.